THE CITY ON THE HILL. I know a quiet city, A silent peaceful city,

A beautiful, strange city, Upon a sunny hill; Where dasies fair are growing; Where the summer winds are blowing Along the earth's green bossom, Adown the streets so still

The streets are long and narrow; The brown thrush and the sparroy Amid the flower-flecked grass The robbins carol in it; You hear the song of linet. Whenever this strange city

Your footsteps chance to pass. The houses in this city-This still and peaceful city, Where never homan pity The dwellers need not ask-Each roof the grasses cover, The green blades each a lover

Wit ith the sunlight bask. There are no sounds of sorrow. No longings for to-merrow; Nor pain to bear and borrow. But all is peaceful over The green grass and the clover.

Of haunts, where thrush and plover

Above its value retreats And there our dear outs weary of treading pathways dreary, With some hower lawn with sorrow Have often turned for rest. And in that fair waiterity, That beautiful, strange city, No thought of pain norpity days go dreeting onward,

Can touch the dweller's breast O peace, so exect and tender. So wrapped about with splendor Of rest, which you can render About each tow last head; We all shall reach this city. Sometime, by thy sweet pity.
